Would you say you're apt, likely, or liable to read this entry?

The words apt, likely, and liable are often used interchangeably when describing possible actions and outcomes. But careful writers know that the words have subtle differences in their meanings.

Apt means “having a tendency” or “ordinarily disposed.”¹ If someone is apt to do something, it’s because they have a natural inclination to do it; in other words, doing the thing would be consistent with their character and/or personal history.

Examples:

Moe can be pretty scatterbrained, so he is apt to forget that we scheduled a meeting for this afternoon.
Patients who have already participated in clinical trials are apt to do so again.

“Only a regular reader of Word for Word is apt to read this entry,” Calvin scoffed.

Likely means “having a high probability of occurring or being true: very probable.”\(^2\) If someone is likely to do something, it’s generally because they are subject to circumstances that favor that outcome.

Examples:

Moe is likely running late to the meeting because his parking garage always has bad traffic after lunch.

Patients who are treated respectfully are likely to engage with their care team.

“Reading this Word for Word entry will likely improve your appreciation of good word choice,” Susie said.

Liable can be defined as “exposed or subject to some usually adverse contingency or action.”\(^3\) If a person is liable to do something, they are (through their own actions or the circumstances of the situation) being put at risk of a bad outcome.

Examples:

If Moe misses another meeting, he is liable to be removed from the project.

Patients who must stop the regimen early are liable to have a recurrence.

“Please don’t make me read your Word for Word entry,” Calvin joked. “I’m liable to learn something!”

References

—Joe Munch

Image Credit: (c) Can Stock Photo / lenm