The words site and cite are easily confused because they are pronounced the same way. However, their meanings are quite different.

Site can be a noun or a verb. As a noun, it refers to a spatial location or an Internet address.\(^1\)

Examples:
The surgeon removed the stitches from the surgical site one week after the procedure.
My favorite Internet site provides excellent coverage of international science news.

When site is used as a verb, it means to locate or to place something into position.\(^1\)

Example:
The institution sited the new proton therapy center as near as possible to the main hospital.

Cite is a verb. When you cite a source, you are quoting it or calling it to someone’s attention as a precedent, proof, or example.\(^2\)

Example:
In our manuscript, we cited eight recent studies on the impact of exercise in patients with metastatic lung cancer.

In reference lists, you may cite an Internet site.
References

--Laura L. Russell

Image Credit: © Can Stock Photo

Copyright © 2019, All rights reserved. Research Medical Library, Scientific Publications Services.